Adam Sanders, shareholder in the Firm's Chattanooga office, litigates complex commercial cases with a special focus on utilities-related work, including defending investor-owned utility companies in eminent domain actions.

Adam Sanders is a shareholder with the law firm Baker Donelson. He has defended investor-owned water and wastewater utilities around the country from eminent domain takeover attempts by local governments, from California to Massachusetts and many states in between. This work involves fighting a municipality's right to take an investor-owned system in the first place, as well as valuing that system should the case proceed to trial on the question of just compensation. He and his colleagues also represent investor-owned utilities in class-action consumer cases, labor and employment matters, mergers and acquisitions, legislation drafting and advising, and rate cases and other regulatory filings. Outside of the utility space, Adam represents companies from many different industries in complex commercial lawsuits, including cases regarding zoning and land use, patent and trademark infringement, and contracts and partnership disputes. He also represents developers, realtors, and similar professionals in advancing their projects and overcoming obstacles, whether involving litigation or not. Adam is outside counsel for an industrial development board in Tennessee.

Adam grew up in Augusta, Georgia, attended college and graduate school in Chicago and Boston, and earned his J.D. from Duke University School of Law. He lives in Chattanooga, Tennessee, with his wife and four daughters, where he enjoys serving as an elder at his church, long days at the softball fields, and coaxing his family into watching old films with him.

Representative Matters

- Represented a large, privately owned water utility company in Montana in an eleven day "right-to-take" condemnation trial, and subsequent six day "valuation" trial. Obtained judgment of $88.6 million plus attorney's fees – far above the condemnor's proof at trial of a $45 million value.
- Obtained verdict of $7.25 million plus $1.1 million interest on behalf of a privately owned wastewater utility company in a two-week jury trial in Lexington, South Carolina. The condemnor, a municipality, urged the jury to award the company less than $1 million in compensation.
- Obtained a $20.3 million verdict on behalf of a privately owned water utility company in a five-day jury trial in Indiana, in which a municipality sought to take the water utility through eminent domain. This verdict was over 200 percent of the $9.5 million valuation advocated by the municipality at trial.
- Obtained complete victory in three-week bench trial in South Carolina federal court in contractor dispute over interstate interchange construction. Court awarded the full sought damages of $3.2 million, and fully denied counterclaims of over $4 million.
- Obtained summary judgment on res judicata grounds in a $4 million contract dispute.
- Won a successful trial verdict on behalf of a landowner in a dispute with a land trust over the terms of a conservation easement. The court adopted the landowner's interpretation of the easement, which allowed the development of a $26 million assisted living facility to move forward, against the objections of the land trust.
- Testified before the Illinois Legislature (House Public Utilities Committee) against proposed legislation that would require a referendum before a municipal utility system could be sold to an investor-owned public utility.

- Successfully obtained summary judgment against an agency of the City of Nashville for breach of a contractual first right of refusal, and successfully defended against the Agency's $200,000 counterclaim.
- Represented a large, privately owned water utility company in a two-week jury trial in Illinois, in which the client's claim for damages was more than $180 million. On day seven of the trial, the case settled with the government (condemnor) agreeing to abandon the takeover attempt.
